In 1911, legendary French fashion designer Paul Poiret introduced to the Parisian elite the first of several collections of Orientalist fashion he would design throughout that decade. Historical accounts of Poiret’s collection of harem trousers, hobble skirts, and turbans suggest that his fashions functioned not simply as clothes (a material form and practice of self-care and self-presentation) but as an early form of virtual technology that extended the limits of the physical body and expanded the possibilities of somatic experience to include the experience of the Oriental other. Poiret’s fashions produced in the wearer the sensation of being transported to the spatially, temporally, and racially distant location of the Orient. Operating as simulation rather than representation, Poiret’s Orientalism is evocative of a history of race and virtuality that has been overlooked in cultural studies of Orientalism as well as the histories of technology. My talk will examine the role of Orientalism in shaping the Mechanical Age in which Poiret emerged as well as discuss the implications of Poiret’s Orientalist fashions for thinking about race as central rather than incidental to the history of virtuality.

Broadly, her research focuses on the relations of race, gender, fashion, and digital media technology. She is completing The Technological Refashioning of Race, a manuscript that brings together technology studies with critical race and gender studies to illuminate fashion’s long history as a virtual technology of race. Her academic and popular writings on Asian/Americans and new and traditional media appear in Feminist Media Studies, positions: east asia cultures critique, Camera Obscura, Signs, Ms. magazine and others. She’s also co-author of a research blog on the politics of fashion and beauty called Threadbared (iheartthreadbared.wordpress.com/) and curates a digital archive called Of Another Fashion (http://ofanotherfashion.tumblr.com/) that focuses on the everyday material cultures and practices of U.S. women of color.
